Julian Assange Extradition to U.S. on Hold

WikiLeaks founder and Australian citizen Julian Assange's extradition to the United States was placed on hold today by London's High Court of Justice, which stated that the United States must ensure that Assange will not face the death penalty for his alleged crimes. Assange is fighting extradition to the United States, where he is facing multiple espionage charges after WikiLeaks published classified documents obtained by U.S. Army intelligence analyst Bradley "Chelsea" Manning.

Assange's wife, Stella, spoke after the court's decision today, stating, "Today's decision is astounding. The courts recognize that Julian is exposed to a flagrant denial of his freedom of expression rights, that he is being discriminated against on the basis of his nationality an Australian, and that he remains exposed to the death penalty, and yet what the courts have done have been to invite a political intervention from the United States to send a letter saying its all okay."
