Indonesia's Government Is Trying to Censor My "Great Replacement" Speech

Here's a point to ponder: Why would the Indonesian government want to censor speech about the Great Replacement of Western peoples via suicidal (im)migration policies?

Because it apparently does, and I should know — the Jakarta regime just targeted my content.

I log on to my computer Monday morning and, as usual, check my email. Lo and behold, there's a message from X's legal department (twitter-legal@x.com). They're notifying me that they'd received a complaint that some of my content violated "the law(s) of Indonesia." They state that the complaint was filed by Kementerian Komunikasi dan Digital RI.

So I look that up and learn it's Indonesia's national Ministry of Communication and Digital Affairs — "RI" means Republik Indonesia. I then say to myself, "OK, what did I post about Indonesia or its officials?" Some countries do, after all, have laws against criticizing their leaders.

I couldn't think of anything and, in fact, it turns out that my "transgression" was something completely different. X provided a link to the targeted content (below).

I don't know the details of this matter, but I do know this: THE most important issue is stopping the Great Replacement and preserving Britain's (and the West's, generally) Western character. Money comes and goes, but demographics is destiny.

Now, why would Indonesia's communications ministry care about that?

The post I was responding to (below) concerned campaign-finance allegations against British politician Nigel Farage, head of nationalist political party Reform UK. Reform is strongly interested in curtailing Third World immigration; hence my comment above.

Wow. Surely Farage is finished?

So I'm still not seeing the Indonesian angle. Someone close to me theorized that perhaps Britain has a large Indonesian population. But, no; I researched it and learned that the nationality's UK numbers are negligible.

Well, then, what gives? Is Indonesia planning on sending hordes Britain's way? Is there a Muslim connection? After all, great controversy surrounds Islamic influence in the UK, and Indonesia has the world's largest Muslim population (ahead of Pakistan and India).

Are many Third World countries simply bent on perpetuating the Great Replacement?

Does Indonesia just consider my statement a hateful sentiment? (In reality, my comment is relatively anodyne insofar as such subject matter goes.)

Or is it merely that someone at the communications ministry stumbled upon my post and was having a bad hair day?

Regardless, this illustrates how globalist, immigrationist forces — which would slap an iron muzzle on anyone daring to speak Truth — are on the march worldwide. Note that virtually the entire planet has "hate speech" laws or some restrictions on substantive expression. These United States, with their First Amendment protections, are quite unique — and perhaps endangered.

Anyway, I guess I won't be taking any Indonesian vacations anytime soon. I might learn upon arrival that the government had some free accommodations planned for me that I didn't bank on.

In closing, though, tell me: Do you have any theories regarding why Indonesia would want to suppress voices opposing the Great Replacement? It's most curious, indeed.
