

Written by Lenore Skenazy on August 4, 2023

Letting Your Kid Play at the Park Is NOT Child Neglect

The Tucson mom found guilty of neglect for letting her 7-year-old son play at the park has finally had her name removed from Arizona's Central Registry, a government blacklist of unfit parents that is maintained by the Department of Child Safety (DCS).

While this is obviously a victory for the mom — and common sense — the constitutional rights of countless other people are still at stake.

The appeal by Sarra (whose full name is being withheld to protect her identity) was handled by the Pacific Legal Foundation (PLF) and the Goldwater Institute, two nonprofit organizations that help defend individual rights. They argued that Arizona's actions were unconstitutional.

Lenore Skenazy

“But instead of responding to this brief, DCS decided to just permanently remove Sarra's name from the list,” says Adi Dynar, an attorney at the PLF. “We suspect they didn't want this kind of ruling on the books, because that affects the other 81,000 names.”

Perhaps the state thought it was better to lose one battle than to deal with an army of parents demanding justice.

The case against Sarra was this: In November 2020, as COVID-19 raged, she let her son and his friend, age 5, play at the park while she shopped for a Thanksgiving turkey.

After all, the grocery was asking shoppers not to bring in kids, and Sarra had played in that park herself as a kid. What's more, a friend happened to be teaching a tai chi class there. But after about 20 minutes, the friend called Sarra to say a police officer was talking to her son.

When Sarra got to the park minutes later, the officer said what she'd done was illegal. While county prosecutors quickly dropped the “lack of supervision” charge after Sarra took a “life skills” class, the folks at DCS were not as easily appeased.

The agency ruled that Sarra had put her son at “unreasonable risk of harm for abduction, injury, harm from a stranger, exposure to drugs and death.” This meant Sarra's name would go on the registry — and remain there for 25 years.

Employers can access this registry, which essentially functions as a blacklist. People on it can't get jobs involving children — a big problem for Sarra, who worked with refugees, helping them to find jobs and often providing child care.

So Sarra took the Central Registry to court. I testified on her behalf, as an expert on how rare stranger kidnappings are. But Sarra lost, and her name was added to the Central Registry. That's when the PLF and Goldwater Institute swooped in to help her with an appeal.

Written by Lenore Skenazy on August 4, 2023

They drew up a brief arguing that the case against Sarra was unconstitutional because the court used a low standard of proof despite the high stakes. They also argued that the agency's system for determining guilt was manifestly unfair. The DCS brings the case against a parent, and if the parent is found guilty, they can then appeal, as Sarra did, to an administrative law judge. But if they're found guilty and want to appeal again, the next hearing is in front of the director of the DCS.

Ultimately, the department ends up adjudicating itself.

"This means no judge, no jury, no nothing," says Dynar.

Thankfully, a new director took over the DCS at the start of 2023. This change in administration became the ostensible reason the agency dropped its case against Sarra. But her attorneys aren't buying it.

"Although we argued that the department was merely trying to escape a decision on the constitutionality of its actions — something that is not usually allowed — the Superior Court judge agreed to let the department abandon the lawsuit," writes Timothy Sandefur, vice president of legal affairs at the Goldwater Institute.

"Obviously our hope was that we would have had a ruling from the court on the constitutional aspects of the case," says Dynar.

Without that, the DCS is free to return to business as usual.

*Lenore Skenazy is president of Let Grow, a contributing writer at Reason.com, and author of Has the World Gone Skenazy? To learn more about Lenore Skenazy (Lskenazy@yahoo.com) and read features by other Creators Syndicate writers and cartoonists, visit the Creators Syndicate webpage at www.creators.com.*

COPYRIGHT 2023 CREATORS.COM

Subscribe to the New American

Get exclusive digital access to the most informative, non-partisan truthful news source for patriotic Americans!

Discover a refreshing blend of time-honored values, principles and insightful perspectives within the pages of "The New American" magazine. Delve into a world where tradition is the foundation, and exploration knows no bounds.

From politics and finance to foreign affairs, environment, culture, and technology, we bring you an unparalleled array of topics that matter most.

Subscribe

What's Included?

- 24 Issues Per Year
- Optional Print Edition
- Digital Edition Access
- Exclusive Subscriber Content
- Audio provided for all articles
- Unlimited access to past issues
- Coming Soon! Ad FREE
- 60-Day money back guarantee!
- Cancel anytime.