Stealth Attack on the Constitution: National Popular Vote

If you've never heard of the National Popular Vote (NPV) interstate compact, I'm not surprised, despite the fact that this stealth attack on the Constitution is working its way through various state legislatures and would dramatically affect the way this country chooses its President. In fact, at least one analyst believes that if enough states pass it, it would mean the end of any chance to ever again elect a Republican as President.

The Left is keeping this George Soros-sponsored effort very hush-hush. But you need to know about it, since its adoption could render meaningless the votes of you and your friends for a Republican candidate for the nation's highest office.

Basically, the NPV says that a state must award all of its electoral votes to whichever candidate for president wins the national popular vote — regardless of how the citizens of that state vote.

In other words, if this measure takes effect and the Republican candidate receives the most votes in your state but his Democrat opponent gets the most votes nationally, then all of your state's electoral votes will go to the Democrat. How's that for making your state election meaningless?

Political analyst Dick Morris said, "If this thing passes, Republicans will never again win a presidential race and that's why all the Democrats are lining up behind it."

Does the NPV really have a chance of becoming the law of the land in this country? I'm sorry to say the answer is an emphatic "yes." Last week, New York became the 10th state to pass it. The measure was approved last month by both branches of New York's state legislature and was signed into law last week by Governor Andrew Cuomo.

"With the passage of this legislation," Cuomo declared, "New York is taking a bold step to fundamentally increase the strength and fairness of our nation's presidential elections."

No, what New York has done is take a bold step toward making sure that the Democrats never relinquish control of the White House.

Harvard Law School professor Alan Dershowitz is one of the few liberals who have spoken out against NVP. He said that it "certainly violates the spirit of the Constitution." And he added, "Plainly, the founders of the Constitution did not intend for there to be a conspiracy among certain states to essentially abolish the Electoral College."

Back in the time when the Founding Fathers created the Electoral College, we didn't have the instant communications we enjoy today. It took a while to learn what happened in another part of the country.

That is why the framers of our Constitution decided to have representatives from each state gather together once every four years to elect a President and Vice President. They gave the responsibility of deciding who would be an elector to the individual states, because they were avid believers in limiting the power of the new federal government as much as possible. especially the 9th and 10th Amendments, to confirm this.

Do we still need an Electoral College to elect the President and Vice President? Maybe not. But if we're going to change a system that's worked for more than 200 years, let's do it the way the Founding Fathers intended, by amending the Constitution. Not by a sneaky end-run around the Constitution.

You can tell a lot about which side wants this measure passed by looking at the states that have already ratified it. In addition to New York, the nine other states are California, Illinois, Hawaii, Maryland, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Rhode Island, Vermont, and Washington. The District of Columbia has also signed the compact.

All of them voted for Obama in 2008 and 2012. All of them are a deep, deep blue. All of them have a vested interest in keeping the entitlements coming from the Federal government. Altogether, these jurisdictions control 165 electoral votes.

Newsmax reported: "It also has been approved by at least one legislative body in these states: Arkansas, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Maine, Michigan, Nevada, New Mexico, North Carolina, and Oregon."

If all 10 of these states also approve the compact, that will be another 78 electoral votes. Since it takes 270 electoral votes to select the next President, that would leave the measure only 27 electoral votes shy of the number needed to take effect.

If your state is one of the 10 where the compact has already been approved in one branch of the Legislature, you'd better get busy. Contact your state representatives and get them to agree to defeat this end run around the Constitution.

And if your state hasn't made either list, don't think for a moment that you don't have anything to worry about. Chances are that there are people hard at work behind the scenes in your state capital promoting this measure.

If NPV does become the law of the land, it will pretty much let the Northeast, the West Coast and Chicago decide who will occupy the White House. And all the red states will be effectively disenfranchised.

If you don't want to live in the result, you'd better get busy and stop the NPV.

Until next time, keep some powder dry.
