Dr. Robert Malone vs. the Establishment Narrative

Observing Covid and post-Covid America through the prism of the major media, it might seem that the scientific and medical communities were in lockstep behind the origin of Covid-19 (entirely natural, of course), as well as the international response in one country after another, from lockdowns, to required mask-wearing, to mandatory injections.

Yes, the media have acknowledged from time to time that there were a few who disagreed with the establishment narrative. But those dissenters were cast as crackpots who were endangering lives by spreading misinformation.

Consider one of the “dissenters,” Dr. Robert Malone, who was interviewed by The New American’s Veronika Kyrylenko for our cover story in this issue, as well as for the much-longer video version (in two parts) that’s available online.

According to a headline in The New York Times, “Robert Malone Spreads Falsehoods About the Vaccines.” And according to The Washington Post, “A vaccine scientist’s discredited claims have bolstered a movement of misinformation.” Yes, the scientist who is the subject of the Post story is Dr. Malone.

These derisive characterizations are baseless. First of all, Dr. Robert Malone is the original inventor of the mRNA technology that was later used for the development of the mRNA vaccines. This cannot be contested, at least not credibly, since he holds the patents. But media outlets attempt to confuse the facts by conflating the pioneering work he did on mRNA technology with the development, by others, of the particular vaccines that were used to fight Covid.

Second, Dr. Malone’s claims have not been discredited. But the same cannot be said of his detractors who have toed the establishment line since the advent of Covid-19. Do you remember when people who postulated that Covid leaked from a lab in Wuhan were canceled on social media?

Remember when face masks were supposed to protect the wearer from getting Covid — but only if everyone else wore masks, too?

Remember when the lockdowns were supposed to prevent the spread of the virus — in churches and small businesses staffed by “non-essential workers,” but not in big-box stores, where the virus did not too dangerously tread?

Remember when getting the jab was supposed to prevent you from getting Covid? That is, until getting the jab was merely supposed to decrease the likelihood that you would get Covid, and make the symptoms less severe if you did get it.

Remember when you were eventually informed that getting the jab really did not offer a whole lot of protection, unless you got the jab multiple times to make yourself fully protected, and unless everyone else got vaccinated as well? The latter, of course, became an argument for everyone getting vaccinated: You supposedly were endangering not only your own life but the lives of others, including the vaccinated, if you did not get the shot.

Remember when Covid was supposed to become the disease of the unvaccinated, until so many vaccinated got Covid that this propaganda line, too, went down the Orwellian memory hole?

But surely the Covid vaccines do more good than harm, right? Prior to the vaccines becoming available, it would have been reasonable to assume that that would be the case. But the mounting vaccine injuries and deaths show otherwise. In fact, the evidence now indicates that the Covid vaccines have been a disaster.

In warning against our top-down Covid policies, Dr. Malone has not been a lone voice. He has been joined by many other credentialed doctors and scientists, who have also been derided and dismissed by the powers that be. Senior Editor Veronika Kyrylenko has interviewed many of them, including Drs. Paul Marik, Pierre Kory, Ryan Cole, and Peter McCullough. She's also interviewed Dr. Malone many times.

But this latest interview with Dr. Malone is markedly different from the previous ones in that it focuses not on the science, but on the politics and the question of why. Why have the policies been what they are, globally, and is there a purpose behind the seeming insanity? Dr. Malone approaches the question of why, as always, as a scientist examining the evidence. We encourage you to thoughtfully consider what he has to say.
