Famine Enters the End Game

In addition to being publisher of The New American magazine, I have also completed work on a new book, End Game, that is available now from Western Islands Publishing, an affiliate of this magazine. Among other things, the book chronicles the more than century-long effort made by the elite oligarchs of the transnationalist Deep State to both control and reduce the human population. A key point of the book is that in recent years these efforts have begun to result in broad policy implementations that are bringing about the deaths of thousands upon thousands of innocent people worldwide in what amounts to the world's first truly international democide.

When the book was being written, the chief agent of this dark and sinister campaign was the combination of Covid and the international policy response to the "pandemic," including the deployment of mass vaccination using untested, experimental mRNA vaccines, the use of dangerous pharmaceutical interventions, and deliberate exposure of senior citizens — the people most vulnerable to respiratory illnesses — to those sickened.

The Deep State's bloodlust still not sated, those who would control and collapse the world's population have now turned to other tools of their trade, namely war and famine. Since its elevation to the White House, the Biden administration has been the regime of chaos and decline. Its first moves included debilitating restrictions on energy, symbolized most shockingly by the abrupt end of the Keystone XL pipeline. As a result of the Biden policies, fuel costs have skyrocketed. In May 2020, the price of a gallon of diesel fuel averaged $2.39 in much of the United States. Just two years later, a gallon of diesel averages $5.62.

The rise in the price of diesel is part of a larger supply disruption in fuels and feedstocks that is destabilizing world-wide transport and agriculture. Both industries run on diesel fuel, and the rise in fuel costs has a direct impact on food availability. This disruption has been dramatically worsened by the U.S. response to the Russian war in Ukraine. Sanctions supposedly intended to punish Russia for its aggression have instead hit Americans in the pocketbook and put producers — especially in agriculture and allied industries — into a bind. The result is fertilizer shortages and supply disruptions that are changing the landscape of agricultural production in ways that will begin to hit consumers at the supermarket in the coming months in the form of ever-higher prices and the increased likelihood of outright shortages.

These are the large-scale problems, but they are compounded by others besides. Questionable testing of chickens for avian flu infection has led to millions of birds culled from flocks, driving up the price of once-affordable eggs and poultry products. These, in particular, are staple foods for most Americans, and their dramatic run-up in price puts food security at risk for many families. In addition, FDA regulatory action has kept baby formula supplies tight, and parents have struggled to provide for newborns as a result. "Nationwide," the Daily Mail reported on May 11, "about 40 percent of large retail stores are out of stock of baby formula, up from 31 percent in mid-April."

The United States has long been among the most agriculturally productive nations on Earth, ranking in the top five producing nations in such foodstuffs as corn, soybeans, sugar beets, potatoes, tomatoes, grapes, oranges, apples, almonds, and wheat, among others. Under normal circumstances, these trends would continue and Americans would not have to face worries about access to food.

But these are not normal circumstances. The internationalist Deep State, as documented in End Game (see ad on inside front cover) and in the pages to come in this issue of The New American, is actively engineering a food-supply crisis. The good news is that because the crisis is engineered — meaning artificially created — it can be stopped. How? Simply put, by supporting constitutional candidates who will look to rein in the Deep State by tightening down the chains of the Constitution.
