

Purple for Parents: Protecting Hoosier Kids From Sexual Perversion

"Choosing to have sex — when, what kind, where, and who with — is something that only you get to define."

No, this shocking statement is not drawn from the annals of Sigmund Freud, nor was it recorded during the 1969 Woodstock orgy.

It is part of a short video posted to X, aimed at young people, and introduced with the degenerate tag line: "Virginity! What is it? What it isn't. And what's the big deal about 'losing' it?"

Planned Parenthood Federation of America (PPFA) produced the smut piece in an apparent attempt to fire off as many obscene terms and images as possible in the span of 56 seconds, all against the backdrop of an elementary-school classroom.

The New American

Moral crusader: Rhonda Miller directs Purple for Parents of Indiana, a parental rights and child advocacy group. She also serves as a field coordinator for The John Birch Society.

The setting is plainly an admission. Parent advocacy groups such as the nonprofit Moms for Liberty have long been warning that PPFA will soon "be a 'community partner' welcomed into your child's school."

Community partners are part of a plan orchestrated by the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in its "Whole School, Whole Community, Whole Child" (WSCC) model. Launched in 2014 in collaboration with the Association for Supervision and Curriculum Development (ASCD), its stated goal is to promote the well-being of students.

What is their definition of "well-being"? For that answer, look no further than ASCD's chief executive officer Richard Culatta, who once served as President Barack Obama's chief education technology officer.

Today, he also holds the position of CEO of the International Society for Technology in Education. ISTE is "a group that has partnered with UNESCO on its 'ICT Competency Framework for Teachers,'" explains a 2019 exposé published by the Alliance to Protect Children. (UNESCO is a UN agency that works closely with the infamous and corrupt Kinsey Institute to promote legal abortion and to groom children through so-called sex education from birth.) The ICT Competency Framework "is already being used in Africa to force Comprehensive Sexuality Education curriculum into schools."

Yet WSCC goes much further than sex ed. Another of its goals is setting up health clinics in public schools across the country. "They're removing the guard rails of parental consent," warns Rhonda Miller, director of Purple for Parents of Indiana (P4PI). Her organization formed in response to the radical teachers union 2018-2019 "Red for Ed" movement, and it works to expose "the indoctrination" and sexualization of children in the public education system."

Grooming Clinics

Miller told The New American that P4PI recently teamed with Hoosiers for Medical Liberty (H4ML) to kill Senate Bill 272 in the Indiana Legislature. It would have established these WSCC school-based health clinics across the state.

In January 24 Senate Judiciary Committee testimony promoting his proposal, bill sponsor Andy Zay, a Republican, invoked the federal "SAFER Communities Act" passed in the wake of the school shooting in Uvalde, Texas. It is a grossly unconstitutional measure that not only expands federal gun control but also subsidizes health coverage in school settings. "The genesis of that bill was to expand and promote school-based health clinics throughout the United States," he said, "and it will help Indiana schools draw down more federal Medicaid funding for services."

Various school administrators also spoke in favor of SB272, with one caveat: They objected to its stipulation of parental involvement. "Our main concern with the bill is requiring a parent present at the time of students receiving our services," said Dr. Megan Carlson, director of health services for Indianapolis Public Schools.

Indiana School Boards Association Executive Director Terry Spradlin even opposed prior written consent for vision and health screenings. "In other words, they don't want parents involved!" Miller exclaimed.

Young-adult literature? Parents have discovered that some of the books in their kids' school libraries cannot be read aloud at school board meetings because they violate decency standards.

These red flags are only some of the reasons P4PI opposed the bill. Other parental-rights activists took turns at the podium relating horror stories of medical errors in the 48 school-based clinics that already exist in Indiana. In one case, a seven-year-old child was administered a Covid vaccine without parental consent. Her parents sued and lost; the judge said it was an honest mistake.

In another instance, a high-school student brought home an unmarked bag of Zoloft tablets, an antidepressant medication with a black box warning to monitor for suicidal tendencies in children and young adults. When her astonished parents contacted the school, they discovered that she was taking multiple forms of school clinic-provided birth control. "Reproductive care is one of the things Indiana covers in the framework of school-based health centers," related one witness.

"These clinics are going in across the nation. Planned Parenthood is coming into the schools and violating parental rights," Miller warns. She points out that educators need to focus on raising woefully inadequate standard test scores rather than launching into the medical field.

Meanwhile, P4PI is celebrating a temporary victory. On February 5, the H4ML website announced: "SB272 for school clinics is DEAD," and the two groups can take credit for playing a large role in that outcome.

But, they say, "the threat persists." Their records show that Republicans have been pushing for school-based health clinics since 2019, and with SAFER Communities Act and WSCC muscle behind them now, it would be recklessly naive to expect the problem to disappear.

Retribution

Indeed, defending children against the onslaught of grooming and pornography hidden within the Trojan horse of modern education is an uphill battle. P4PI's efforts earned the group an arguably praiseworthy position on the Southern Poverty Law Center's annual Hate and Extremism report published last June.

Two months later, the online event management website Eventbrite deleted two P4PI conferences: RSVP America: Restoring Social Virtue and Purity to America and Save Our Children. The platform accused P4PI of violating its policy on "Hateful, Dangerous or Violent Content and Events," and warned that future violations could get them canceled.

Then, last December, P4PI became the victim of cyberbullying. Unknown political adversaries impersonated the group online, sending vile and threatening messages via email and social media. Miller calls it "demonic," but vows, "We will not stop."

What earned such targeting? Miller credits P4PI's advocacy success early last year in two legislative crusades. One was the passage of Senate Bill 12. Labeled by opponents as a book ban and war on educators, SB12 protects elementary- and high-school students from exposure to pornography in library books, allowing parents to file complaints about inappropriate material. It also removes the legal defense that such vice has educational value.

Additionally, P4PI worked with House Republican Lorissa Sweet to pass HB1001, a measure prohibiting Indiana University from using state money to support its sex-research arm, the Kinsey Institute, which was founded in 1947 by the father of the American sexual revolution, Alfred Kinsey. Miller says that Kinsey conducted so-called sex research, including the rape and torture of thousands of children.

Working against such perversion makes the targeted attacks against P4PI worth enduring, Miller says. She vows that P4PI will never give up until children in her state are protected from predators in educators' clothing.
