Mom Arrested at Playground Amid COVID Speaks Out

In this exclusive interview with The New American, Idaho mother Sara Brady talks about her arrest at a play date at a public park amid government lockdown orders that many critics view as unconstitutional. Brady, who is married to a police officer, is now being prosecuted by the state Attorney General's office on a "trespassing" charge. However, she is speaking out, and many members of her community are rallying around her. The incredible case has sparked nationwide outrage and debate about the limits of government power and the constitutionality of these decrees by mayors and governors acting as little dictators.
