More “Trans” Violence: Man in Dress Shoots Up School Ice Hockey Match

Here’s an interesting fact you won’t hear from legacy media: “Transgenders” are more likely to commit murder than be murdered.

Here’s another fact: “You fundamentally can’t change sex,” confessed former “transgender” Alan Finch years ago. “Transsexualism was invented by psychiatrists.”

More and more people are again realizing what we once knew instinctively: Believing you’re the opposite sex is mental disorder. Given that it is, too, it’s not surprising that an inordinate number of “crazed shooters” are “trans.”

There just was, for example, a school massacre by a MUSS \(Made-up Sexual Status, aka “transgender”\) individual in gun-control-crazy Canada. And now, out of Pawtucket, Rhode Island, comes the case of 56-year-old Robert Dorgan. A hulking man in a dress, he opened fire at a high-school hockey game Monday, killing his wife and one of his children, and injuring a family friend and two others before committing suicide.

CBS Boston reported on the story earlier today, writing:

Witnesses described the fear and confusion when shots rang out during a co-op boys hockey game at the Dennis M. Lynch Arena around 2:30 p.m. Two adults were killed and three victims are in critical condition at Rhode Island Hospital in Providence. Pawtucket Police Chief Tina Goncalves said ... the shooting stemmed from a family dispute.

That’s putting it mildly. A woman identifying herself as Dorgan’s daughter was more blunt. Her father was “very sick,” she told reporters outside the Pawtucket police station. “He shot my family, and he’s dead now.”

One Pink Flag — and Red Flags All Over

Unfortunately, our society didn’t officially regard Dorgan as sick, only as expressing himself. But there were warning signs aplenty. As The Telegraph informs:

In 2020, Dorgan told police he had undergone gender reassignment surgery, and selfies on his Facebook account showed him wearing make-up and female clothing.

Rhonda Dorgan cited the surgery among the reasons why she filed for divorce, as well as his “narcissistic and personality disorder traits”.

Those grounds were later replaced with “irreconcilable differences”....

An even starker picture was painted by commentator Geoffrey Ingersoll at his “State of the Day” Substack blog:

Let’s run through Dorgan’s derangement. He changed his name to “Roberta Esposito,” so he was not only transgender; he was transracial. He called himself a Republican, followed several large GOP accounts, but he also harassed them nonstop over transgender issues. He was a prolific reply guy whenever anyone questioned trans ideology. When Kevin Sorbo called Democrat Rep. “Sarah” McBride, another man in a dress, “creepy,” Dorgan replied “keep bashing us. but do not wonder why we go BERSERK.”

He apparently had both SS and Totenkopf tattoos, so a real Nazi enthusiast. Not unusual for hardcore motorcycle enthusiasts though, which Dorgan apparently was. He was also a big fan of Nick Fuentes (except for his hands, which he frequently said Fuentes should surgically alter) and InfoWars. Dorgan was also very clearly a gym rat. Many images of him in dresses also feature him busting out the ol’ biceps.

But of all the demographic wickets Dorgan hit, the most obvious one went ignored: Insane.

Collective Insanity

Ingersoll then points out that the wider society is partially to blame — for tolerating the intolerable. Dorgan’s insanity should’ve gotten him separated from normal society, the commentator avers, a society that he perhaps hated and envied for being normal. Instead, Ingersoll laments, perhaps the community is just too polite. Perhaps they’ve also been bludgeoned non-stop by a far-left psyop. They’ve been demoralized. De ... Moralized.

The red flags are too numerous to count, in Dorgan’s case, and somehow they went almost entirely ignored. Number one, he’s a father abandoning his family to pursue fringe sexual deviancy. Normal, healthy societies would usually shame such behavior, but not us. Number two, he's not a woman and he never will be. In more discerning and morally moored decades of American history, such pursuits, if pursued at all, would be kept in the bedroom, never mind appearing in full, unhinged regalia in the stands of a high school sporting event.

Something is broken when both one and two appear in public and there isn't a concerted, community effort to put a stop to it. Instead everyone just sits and bears it. De ... Moralized.

The red-flag point is obvious. In fact, I'd commented on it below just prior to writing this article.

Reality: There are such things as "red flags." If a guy tells you he can't live without drinking a liter of vodka a day, that's a red flag. If a woman is cutting herself regularly and mutilating her body, that's a red flag.

And if a fellow claims he's something he's not—the...

The money line: "Oh, and if a society doesn't see the latter [MUSS] red flag as a red flag, that's a red flag."

Now, many will say what one respondent did to my above tweet. "What about the red flag of three women a day being killed by domestic partners?" he asked rhetorically. Yet the Dorgan incident is not just one cherry-picked case. Rather, it reflects statistics.

Righting the Ship

Just consider data out of Britain. Researchers found that from 2008-2017, MUSS individuals' murder rate was 71 percent greater than the incidence of them being murdered.

They also have a high suicide rate and exhibit significant degrees of various social ills.

As for the violence, it's perhaps not surprising. It's not just MUSS individuals' underlying psychological issues, either. It's also the "help" the medical establishment offers.

Ponder, for example, the studies showing that MUSS women receiving testosterone in an effort to become a simulacrum of a man experience increased rage and aggression.

And anecdotally speaking, my experience is that many MUSS individuals, especially those activism-minded, are in fact quite hostile. After I editorialized against their agenda years back, one commented that he wanted my "head on a platter." Then there's the 2015 Dr. Drew show incident (video below), featuring burly MUSS reporter "Zoey Tur." Far from ladylike, he threatened to send commentator Ben Shapiro "home in an ambulance."

The upshot here is that these troubled people need help, not enablement. A person might have Body Integrity Identity Disorder (BIID) and be certain his eyes don't belong in his head. But we don't pluck them out as remedy.

It's not compassionate saying to the mentally disordered, "Here, we'll help you live your delusion. And whatever body parts must be removed toward this end, we'll do the cutting" (for money, of course).

A prerequisite for helping the mentally disordered is having a society that's philosophically, spiritually, and morally in order. And, first, we must accept that “transgender” people do not exist. For people don’t have “gender” (words do) — and you can’t switch sexes.

Second, believing otherwise, and trying to live otherwise, is a warning sign we ignore at our own peril.
