

Federal Whistleblower Alleges Coverup of Reporting Adverse Reactions to COVID-19 Vaccines

A registered nurse working undercover with Project Veritas is claiming that doctors are not reporting cases of adverse reactions to the COVID-19 vaccines. Jodi O'Malley, who works for the federal government at the Phoenix Indian Medical Center (PIMC) in Arizona, made the allegations in a video released Monday evening.

"This is evil at the highest level," O'Malley told Project Veritas founder James O'Keefe.

O'Malley wore a hidden camera during recent shifts and caught HHS physician Dr. Maria Gonzales giving her candid opinion about at least one of the vaccines currently being given out for COVID-19.

"The government doesn't want to show that the darn vaccine is full of s**t," Gonzales says at one point. O'Malley believes that adverse reactions to the COVID-19 vaccines are being severely underreported, even though such cases are required to be submitted to the Vaccine Adverse Event Reporting System (VAERS).

According to VAERS, physicians are required to report "Any adverse event listed in the VAERS Table of Reportable Events Following Vaccination that occurs within the specified time period after vaccinations," and "An adverse event listed by the vaccine manufacturer as a contraindication to further doses of the vaccine."

According to O'Malley, this is not being done at her hospital, for the most part. In another portion of the video, O'Malley discusses possible reasons for that with her colleague Deanna Paris.

"Who's writing the VAERS report?" O'Malley asks in frustration.

"Nobody," Paris answers. "Because it takes over half an hour to write the damn thing."

In another exchange between O'Malley and Gonzales, the nurse and the physician candidly discuss a patient in the hospital's emergency room:

"And now you've got this guy in room 4 who got his second dose of vaccine on Tuesday, has been short of breath," O'Malley explains. "Now his BNP is elevated, DiDimer elevated, ALT. All his liver enzymes are elevated. His PT — his PT-INR is elevated."

"He's got probably myocarditis," Dr. Gonzales exclaims. "All this is bulls**t. Now probably myocarditis due to the vaccine. But now they're not going to blame the vaccine."

"[The physician] has an obligation to report that, doesn't he," O'Malley asks.

"They are not reporting," Gonzales says. "Because they want to shove it under the mat."

According to O'Malley, these are not isolated, once-in-a-while cases. "I've seen dozens of people come in with adverse reactions," O'Malley said.

One of those patients was a 15-year-old boy who had been given the Pfizer vaccine at the end of July and who was being treated for a pulmonary embolism (pe) — a blood clot. Blood clots have been reported to be one of the more severe side effects to the COVID-19 vaccines.

"This is a 15-year-old, normal weight, healthy child. No reason for him to have a blood clot," O'Malley said.

Blood clots, along with myocarditis and pericarditis, have been reported as serious side effects of the COVID-19 vaccines.

According to O'Malley, PIMC has never issued any directives or guidelines on reporting adverse vaccine reactions to the VAERS system.

In a sit-down interview with O'Keefe, O'Malley explained her reasons for coming forward and risking her job.

"What prompted me to do this was when I was House Supervisor one night, and one of my coworkers had taken the [COVID-19] vaccine two weeks ago, and she didn't want to. She went throughout this entire pandemic working in the intensive care unit, which pretty much was a COVID unit," the nurse said.

"She didn't want to take [the COVID-19 vaccine] because of her religious beliefs and she was coerced into taking it. It's like nobody — nobody should have to decide between their livelihood, being 'a part of the team in the hospital,' or take the [COVID] vaccine."

"Now we're just making people take it, and then there are reactions to it," O'Malley added.

In a subsequent video released just hours after Project Veritas released the video on social media, O'Keefe reported that Facebook and Instagram (which is owned by Facebook) had already censored the video from their platforms.

"We encourage free expression but don't allow false information about COVID that could contribute to physical harm," Instagram reportedly wrote to O'Keefe in its explanation about the censorship.

At the same time President Joe Biden is attempting to strong-arm the military and businesses into vaccinating all employees — often against their wishes — the federal government and their friends in the mainstream media and Big Tech appear to be trying to cover up essential information about vaccine side-effects.

This is reportedly only Part 1 of a Project Veritas exposé on potential problems with the experimental vaccines being peddled by governments worldwide.
