A spokesperson for Governor Abbott later confirmed to the Associated Press that the order indeed applies to “abortion in most cases.”

Texas Attorney General Ken Paxton further clarified the order on Monday with a statement to all licensed healthcare professionals.

“This prohibition applies throughout the State and to all surgeries and procedures that are not immediately medically necessary, including routine dermatological, ophthalmological, and dental procedures, as well as most scheduled healthcare procedures that are not immediately medically necessary such as orthopedic surgeries or any type of abortion that is not medically necessary to preserve the life or health of the mother,” Paxton explained.

Paxton’s statement explained the order was necessary to increase resources to help fight the coronavirus pandemic, and emphasized that the state would prosecute those who violate the order.

Paxton specifically called out abortion providers: “No one is exempt from the governor’s executive order on medically unnecessary surgeries and procedures, including abortion providers. Those who violate the governor’s order will be met with the full force of the law.”

Texas Right to Life told Life News that the order could save nearly 3,000 babies from abortion in the next month and has asked the state to expand its order to include chemical abortions.

“Texas Right to Life is grateful that the loss of life during the COVID-19 outbreak will be decreased thanks to the halt in abortions. We call on the State of Texas to expand the order to include chemical abortions as well,” it continued.

Despite a March 18 mandate by Ohio Health Director Amy Acton to cease all elective and non-essential surgeries effective last week, with few exceptions, Ohio’s abortion clinics continued to perform abortions, prompting a direct order from Ohio Attorney General Dave Yost ordering them to stop doing so. Yost’s office wrote in letters sent on Friday to violating clinics that surgical abortions “involve the use of PPE [personal protective equipment], which is currently in demand to fight the coronavirus pandemic.”

“This is not an abortion issue,” Bethany McCorkle, a spokeswoman for the Ohio Attorney General’s Office, clarified to CNN. “A letter was also sent to a urology group that was allegedly performing elective surgeries. As our client, if Dr. Acton’s office determines that her order was violated by any surgical facility in Ohio, they can refer it to our office to pursue legal action on behalf of the Ohio Department of Health.”

Planned Parenthood has issued a statement contending it can continue to provide abortions in Ohio while abiding by the state’s order regarding personal protective equipment and accused Yost and Ohio Right to Life president and State Medical Board member Mike Gonidakis of “exploiting the Covid-19 crisis to further their agenda to close Ohio’s abortion clinics,” an accusation rejected by Acton, who asserts her order was apolitical.

“I am the doctor for 11.7 million people and all women no matter where they fall on this,” she said. “And I think that’s very important we cannot allow the politics of things to get in the way of doing what we have to do in a state of emergency.”

Meanwhile, though a number of other states have called for a stop to all non-essential surgeries and procedures, abortion clinics have conducted business as usual and it is unclear whether the states will clarify their orders to include abortion and punish those who fail to comply.

In Pennsylvania, for example, where Democratic Governor Tom Wolf issued a March 19 executive order calling for closures to all non-essential businesses, abortion clinics continue to operate. Governor Wolf announced that enforcement actions on his executive order would begin this week, and could include citations, fines, and license suspensions, but has not specifically addressed abortion practices. As noted by Life News, Wolf has worked to force taxpayers to fund Planned Parenthood, so it seems unlikely he will take extreme action against the industry.

In California, despite orders for all 40 million residents to remain at home and all non-essential businesses to close, all seven Planned Parenthood affiliates remain operational and continue to provide abortions.

In some states, officials have carved out exceptions for abortions, despite orders to discontinue elective and non-urgent procedures.

In Washington, for example, Governor Jay Inslee declared abortion to be an “essential service.” Massachusetts Governor Charlie Baker and California Governor Gavin Newsom have done the same. North Carolina Health Department spokeswoman Sarah Peel has said abortion clinics are not covered by a directive asking hospitals to suspend all elective procedures.

Kentucky Governor Andy Beshear has ordered an end to most elective medical procedures, the Courier Journal reports, but his order left a lot of discretion to providers to determine which services to cancel, thereby enabling abortions to continue.

Pro-abortion groups claim the states who have discontinued abortions are using the coronavirus crisis to advance an agenda.

“Abortion is time-sensitive, essential health care,” said Katherine Hancock Ragsdale, president of the National Abortion Federation. “Women deserve better than a craven exploitation of a health care crisis in furtherance of an anti-abortion agenda.”

But pro-life advocates have seized on claims of “my body, my choice” to underscore the elective nature of abortion.

“If abortion is a ‘choice’ then abortion is an elective procedure,” said Mark Harrington, president of the anti-abortion group Created Equal.
