

Are Faithless Electors Constitutional?

As President Donald Trump carries on in his quest to assure that all ballots counted were legal and that all legal ballots were counted, there is another aspect of his efforts to ensure the rightful candidate serves as president for the next four years: the electors.

Constitutionally, the electors are the only votes that count.

Article II, Section 1 and the 12th Amendment of the U.S. Constitution set the following method for choosing the president of the United States:

Photo: No-Mad / iStock / Getty Images Plus

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of four years, and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same term, be elected, as follows:

Each state shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress: but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

The electors shall meet in their respective states and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same state with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of the government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate; — The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted; — the person having the greatest number of votes for President, shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. But in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by states, the representation from each state having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the states, and a majority of all the states shall be necessary to a choice.

As anyone can see, there is no compulsory mechanism regarding the votes cast by the electors. Any controls on the process is the purview of the state legislatures, giving the federal government no constitutional role whatsoever in directing the electors.

Written by Joe Wolverton, II, J.D. on December 4, 2020

{modulepos inner_text_ad}

There are many, though, who suggest that as the popular vote is the method employed by states to determine which candidate is “awarded” the elector votes possessed by the states, then the electors themselves are merely mirrors of the popular will and thus have no discretion regarding which candidate receives their votes.

Others, however, consider the electors as a form of filter between the passions of the people en masse and the choice of chief executive.

Of those who saw things this way, were many of our Founding Fathers.

During the debates at the Constitutional Convention of 1787, there were many proposals for choosing the president. The convention finally settled on a complex system that the delegates believed would result in the best men being elected as the chief executive.

In the deliberations of the ratification debates at the various state conventions, there were fewer heated arguments over this provision in the Constitution than many others.

With very few exceptions, the men serving at those conventions were students of history and they knew that democracies were doomed to chaos and violence. Therefore, the thought of having the people directly elect the president was dismissed by all but the most ardently democratic delegates.

The concept of filtering the effect of faction and corruption through layers of representation is central to the Constitution. For example, although the method for choosing U.S. senators was altered by the 17th Amendment, U.S. senators were elected by the members of the state legislatures.

In the present case, the principle is practiced by having the members of the state legislatures appoint electors, and those electors elect the president. While not directly elected by the people, the people’s choice for president is manifest in their votes for state legislature. It should be presumed that a citizen would vote for a state legislator that would mirror his own choice for chief executive. It’s that simple.

Furthermore, the U.S. Constitution’s process of presidential election by what we call the electoral college would be unnecessarily redundant if those electors were simply meant to vote as the people themselves would vote! Why not just cut out the middle man?

Because, for the Founders, the middle man — the electors — were meant to be men of eminent virtue and wisdom who could be relied upon to cast votes for men of equal mettle.

As evidence of the purpose behind the process, consider these statements on the subject taken from The Federalist, commonly called The Federalist Papers.

In Federalist, No. 10, James Madison wrote that a republic is able to “refine and enlarge the public views, by passing them through the medium of a chosen body of citizens, whose wisdom may best discern the true interest of their country, and whose patriotism and love of justice, will be least likely to sacrifice it to temporary or partial considerations.”

But “democracies,” he added, “have ever been spectacles of turbulence and contention; have ever been found incompatible with personal security, or the rights of property; and have, in general, been as short in their lives as they have been violent in their deaths.”

In Federalist, No. 68, Alexander Hamilton explained how the method chosen by him and his colleagues of electing the president was still influenced by the will of the people.

Written by Joe Wolverton, II, J.D. on December 4, 2020

The Founders wanted the sense of the people to be reflected in the choice of the individuals — the electors — in whom so important a trust was to be confided.

Regarding the decision to rely on such a body to make such an important decision, Hamilton wrote:

It was equally desirable, that the immediate election should be made by men most capable of analyzing the qualities adapted to the station, and acting under circumstances favourable to deliberation, and to a judicious combination of all the reasons and inducements that were proper to govern their choice. A small number of persons, selected by their fellow citizens from the general mass, will be most likely to possess the information and discernment requisite to so complicated an investigation.

It was peculiarly desirable, to afford as little opportunity as possible to tumult and disorder. This evil was not least to be dreaded in the election of a magistrate, who was to have so important an agency in the administration of government. But the precautions which have been so happily concerted in the system under consideration, promise an effectual security against this mischief.

So, despite the democratic mania of many politicians, the concept of an elector casting his vote for a candidate other than the one chosen by the popular vote is a historically sound occurrence, and, to Madison and Hamilton, perhaps a necessary one, as well.

Subscribe to the New American

Get exclusive digital access to the most informative, non-partisan truthful news source for patriotic Americans!

Discover a refreshing blend of time-honored values, principles and insightful perspectives within the pages of "The New American" magazine. Delve into a world where tradition is the foundation, and exploration knows no bounds.

From politics and finance to foreign affairs, environment, culture, and technology, we bring you an unparalleled array of topics that matter most.

What's Included?

- 24 Issues Per Year
- Optional Print Edition
- Digital Edition Access
- Exclusive Subscriber Content
- Audio provided for all articles
- Unlimited access to past issues
- Coming Soon! Ad FREE
- 60-Day money back guarantee!
- Cancel anytime.

Subscribe