

Nullification: How States Can Rein In Federal Spending

The United States federal government has far exceeded its constitutional limitations, regularly violating Americans' God-given rights and exercising powers not delegated to it. State governments have an obligation to resist these usurpations by nullifying — that is, making unenforceable, or null and void — all unconstitutional federal actions.

Nullification has been — and is still being — effectively used to prevent the enforcement of unconstitutional federal laws and other actions. But how can states nullify federal spending? Opponents of nullification — including those calling for an Article V convention to propose a so-called Balanced Budget Amendment, with its many loopholes — frequently claim that nullification is helpless to rein in the federal government's reckless spending.

kaitlingruss/iStock/Getty Images Plus

However, such claims are false. States can use nullification to stop unconstitutional federal spending, just as they can use it to stop other federal usurpations. There are at least two specific ways states can do this.

One way is for state legislatures to enact a “State Sovereignty and Federal Tax Funds Act,” also referred to as an “escrow” law. Under this law, federal taxes would first be required to go into a special fund controlled by the state government. The state would then calculate the percentage of constitutional federal spending, meaning for purposes specifically enumerated in the U.S. Constitution for the federal government. Then, the state would send only that percentage of the funds to the Internal Revenue Service (IRS). Depending on the specific bill versions introduced, the remaining funds would either go toward state expenditures currently reliant on federal funding — thus ensuring the state is financially independent — or be returned to taxpayers.

This bill would save taxpayers a significant amount of their hard-earned income, considering that an estimated 80% of federal spending is unconstitutional. Additionally, it would put heavy pressure on the federal government to cut its reckless spending while also financially protecting the states from federal retribution.

State legislators are often reluctant to nullify unconstitutional federal laws as they fear losing their federal funding in retaliation. However, an “escrow” bill is one of the strongest responses to this threat, and would remind the federal government of its proper, limited place in the U.S. system of government.

This bill has been introduced in multiple states in previous years, including Georgia, Missouri, Ohio, Oklahoma, and Washington. However, no state thus far has enacted it into law. To get serious about countering federal usurpations, and to gain the upper hand in the fight to restore constitutional governance and fiscal responsibility, state legislators must enact into law an “escrow” bill.

Written by Peter Rykowski on September 1, 2022

Another way states can rein in unconstitutional federal spending is to nullify the Federal Reserve, which itself is unconstitutional, and its current monopoly on currency. The central bank's ability to create money has encouraged Congress to engage in reckless spending.

Already, states have enacted legislation taking steps in this direction. For example, 42 states have abolished or curtailed sales taxes on precious metals such as gold and silver, a major step toward treating them as money. (The states that have not done this are Hawaii, Kentucky, Maine, Mississippi, New Jersey, New Mexico, Vermont, and Wisconsin.)

Meanwhile, three states — Oklahoma, Utah, and Wyoming — have explicitly reaffirmed the validity of gold and silver as legal tender, further encouraging their use in competition with Federal Reserve notes, which are nothing more than elastic fiat currency. Additionally, Texas has taken the step of creating a state precious-metals depository, further reducing state dependence on the Fed. Tennessee has enacted legislation to study creating its own depository.

While these are positive steps, state governments must go all the way by enforcing the Constitution's Gold and Silver Clause (Article I, Section 10), which declares that "No State shall ... make any Thing but gold and silver Coin a Tender in Payment of Debts." This part of the Constitution has not been changed by a constitutional amendment; therefore Article I, Section 10 is still the "Supreme Law of the Land." Nullifying the Fed will help rein in federal spending, and will also stop the rampant inflation that Americans are experiencing.

It will not be easy to enact strong nullification legislation; state governments will come under significant opposition, including from the federal government, the judiciary, media, big business, and others. But for these nullification measures to succeed, state officials need to be bold and courageous. And if voters are both informed about nullification and made familiar with the Constitution, they will support nullification efforts.

If the Constitution is fully enforced, the size and scope of government will shrink significantly. The time to begin enforcing it is now.

To urge your state legislators to enforce the Constitution by nullifying unconstitutional federal laws and edicts, visit The John Birch Society's legislative alert here.

Subscribe to the New American

Get exclusive digital access to the most informative, non-partisan truthful news source for patriotic Americans!

Discover a refreshing blend of time-honored values, principles and insightful perspectives within the pages of "The New American" magazine. Delve into a world where tradition is the foundation, and exploration knows no bounds.

From politics and finance to foreign affairs, environment, culture, and technology, we bring you an unparalleled array of topics that matter most.

Subscribe

What's Included?

- 24 Issues Per Year
- Optional Print Edition
- Digital Edition Access
- Exclusive Subscriber Content
- Audio provided for all articles
- Unlimited access to past issues
- Coming Soon! Ad FREE
- 60-Day money back guarantee!
- Cancel anytime.