Senate May Vote on Tax Bill Before Midnight

According to Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, a Senate vote on the tax deal legislation may come “sometime before midnight” tonight if he reaches an agreement with Senate Republicans to act before the 30 hours of debate time runs out at 12:30 a.m. If passed, the legislation moves to the House of Representatives, on whose floor it could be voted as early as Wednesday.

On Monday evening, the Senate voted 83-15 in a cloture vote to advance the legislation for a vote. However, Senate procedures indicate that following a cloture vote, a bill could be debated for an additional 30 hours.

Unsurprisingly, following the cloture vote, 27 amendments were filed in the Senate to be added to the tax deal, which may hold up the bill’s passage.

The Atlanta Journal Constitution explains, “Senators of both parties have introduced everything from a completely new bill, to expansion and extension of certain tax breaks and modifications of individual provisions.”

The list of the amendments is as follows:

- SA 4775 Stabenow, et al — Expansion of Qualifying Advanced Energy Project Credit

In addition to the amendments, Senator Tom Coburn had hoped to have a Senate vote on at least one of his plans to offset the billions of dollars the legislation is said to cost by cutting spending elsewhere.

According to San Francisco Gate, however, “Without an agreement from all senators, none of [the amendments] will receive a vote.”

In the House, Democrats continue to maintain hopes of toughening estate tax language, despite the possibility that such a change could threaten the compromise to which the Senate and White House agreed.

Congressional Daily writes, “House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) indicated Monday that House leaders would at least try to revise the bill. Hoyer, speaking at the National Press Club, said the House was looking at possible changes to the estate tax provisions, although he did not specify what those changes would be.”

Hoyer also predicts that more than 53 Democrats in the fiscally conservative Blue Dog Caucus will vote in favor of the Senate-passed legislation.

President Obama, who has expressed an understanding of House Democrats’ concerns, added, “But that’s the nature of compromise. I urge the House of Representatives to act quickly on this important matter.”

A House Democrat aide reports that the bill can come to the House floor as early as Wednesday.
