Resisting the global tyranny coming down on humanity must begin with effective action at the local level, said American Policy Center chief Tom DeWeese in this interview with The New American magazine's Alex Newman at the Doctors for Disaster Preparedness summit in Las Vegas. To start with DeWeese called on activists to join with others and start studying the local situation when it comes to sustainable development and private property rights. Watching local meetings and investigating key players will give locals the intelligence they need to take effective action, including speaking out at public meetings and getting together with elected officials to present accurate information. DeWeese also suggested getting information out through the media and even social media. Eventually, getting good people elected to replace the bad ones is critical.
