The decades-long official coverup of an epidemic of child rape and sex trafficking by Islamic gangs is falling apart as Elon Musk and other world leaders shine the light on it, but the United Kingdom is still in major trouble, explained Hearts of Oak leader Peter Mcilvenna in this interview with The New American magazine's Alex Newman. Mcilvenna, who has served as chief of staff for Lord Pearson of Rannoch in the British House of Lords for a decade, said the evil that has overtaken the UK must be combatted and stopped. Ironically, the far-left prime minister appears to be more outraged by the exposure than the systematic rape of children. Mcilvenna and Newman also discussed the fact that almost 10 percent of London's population is illegally in the country. Finally, the two discuss the now-infamous murder of three young girls by an Islamic child of African immigrants, a story that sparked unrest across Britain.
