Creating an informed citizenry is vital, if we are to save our freedoms and our Republic. But it is not, by itself, sufficient. If freedom is to survive and flourish, it is also imperative that enough Americans become actively involved in the freedom movement — and not just involved, but also organized, so they can magnify their efforts through concerted action. There is one column in every print edition of The New American that is dedicated to making this point. It is called “Taking Action.” And in this episode of Beyond the Cover, host Gary Benoit interviews John Birch Society CEO Bill Hahn, the writer of the column, about taking action.
