Page 1 of 4

that what it was all about? Well, not really, according to a growing chorus of voices that insists "No" doesn't mean no, "Out" doesn't mean out, "Leave" doesn't mean leave, "irreversible" doesn't mean irreversible, etc.

The Brexit vote on June 23 means Britain will exit the European Union, right? Isn't

Yes, it is true that "Remain" lost and "Leave" won. And, yes, it is true that Remain advocate Prime Minister David Cameron, just two days before the Brexit referendum vote, cranked up a last-ditch "Project Fear" blitz imploring British voters not to take the "irreversible" step of serving Brussels with divorce papers. Cameron pleaded with older voters to resist the call to "leave Europe" (as if the decades-old political EU is synonymous with the centuries-old historical, cultural, geographical Europe) and urged them to "think about the hopes and dreams of your children and grandchildren."

"And remember," he warned, "they can't undo the decision we take. If we vote out, that's it. It is irreversible. We will leave Europe — for good. And the next generation will have to live with the consequences far longer than the rest of us."

German Chancellor Angela Merkel also echoed that "irreversible" message, after meeting with Cameron at the summit of EU leaders in Brussels, on June 28, the Tuesday after the Brexit vote. "I see no possibility to reverse this. We would do well to accept this reality," Merkel told reporters.

However, even as Merkel, Cameron, EU Commission President Jean-Claude Juncker, and EU Council President Donald Tusk continue to sound the irreversible/permanent/forever theme (most obviously in a desperate attempt to quell the "Domino effect" of exit referenda by other member states), other voices belonging to the same Remain side are suggesting — and some outright proposing — that the U.K. Parliament simply ignore and defy the Brexit referendum, and vote to stay in the EU. Other Brexit critics are suggesting the U.K. hold a second In/Out referendum, using the leverage it has won with the Brexit vote to obtain concessions, particularly on such thorny issues as border control/migration, EU foreign/military policy, EU judicial authority, taxation, monetary policy, and spending.

The "Remainians" have a legal, technical point in their favor: The Brexit referendum was, legally, a nonbinding "advisory" vote, notwithstanding the fearmongering, handwringing, once-and-forever claims of irreversibility by Cameron and Company during the campaign. Legally, Parliament (which heavily favored the Remain side) can disregard the results of the referendum. The big question now is, are there enough Remainians in the Conservative and Labour Parties who are willing to defy the popular

Globalists Move to Sabotage Brexit

New American

Written by William F. Jasper on June 29, 2016

New American

Written by William F. Jasper on June 29, 2016

mandate signified by the Brexit vote, and risk the political backlash?

The U.K.'s Remainian politicians, along with their Big Business and Big Banking allies (and the British and world press), are working on that. "Project Fear II" is in full operational mode, hammering British voters with a constant barrage of stories of impending market doom, jobs doom, investment doom, pension doom, business doom, banking doom, real estate doom, national security doom — all in a heated effort to stir sufficient panic to stampede voters into acceptance of a redo vote.

A big part of that propaganda campaign is publishing "Brexit buyer's remorse" stories about, and comments by, Leave voters, stating, in effect, "Gee, I didn't know it would have this terrible effect. Maybe we didn't think this through; we probably need a revote."

Here are a few of the politicians and political commentators laying the ground work for a "Brexit redo":

Former Labour Party Prime Minister Tony Blair — In an extended television interview with Andrew Neil on BBC, Blair, a rabid pro-EU globalist, detailed the Brexit doom and gloom arguments. When asked by Neil about putting the Brexit issue to a second public vote, Blair said, "Why rule anything out."

Health Secretary Jeremy Hunt – A member of Cameron's Conservative Party and a Member of Parliament, Hunt was one of the first British pols out of the gate to propose further negotiations with the EU and a second vote on the Brexit. Hunt says that after Cameron steps down in October and a new prime minister is selected (a job he is vying for), the new government should negotiate a deal with Brussels, which would then be "put to the British people."

Tim Farron, Leader of the Liberal Democrats – Two days after the Brexit vote, Farron announced that his party would stand at the next general election on a platform of derailing Brexit and keeping Britain in the European Union.

Jaroslaw Kaczynsk, former Polish Prime Minister — Kaczynski, the powerful leader of Poland's ruling Law and Justice Party, described the Brexit as "very bad," and called for EU reforms and a second Brexit referendum in the U.K.

Sorin Moisa, Member of the European Parliament (MEP) – In an essay for EurActive.com entitled "Why Brexit will not happen," Moisa, a Romanian member of the Socialists and Democrats Group, writes that "public opinion will wake up to the truth about Brexit," and that some coalition of Labour and Conservative politicians will "force a new referendum." "The new vote will be the real choice," he claims, "relying on genuine social understanding of what is actually at stake, and chances are it will reject Brexit with a strong majority. Giving up negotiations for the Exit Treaty should then close the matter once and for all. A huge social learning exercise will have taken place for both the UK and Europe. It's going to be a lesson for populists of all creeds."

Philip Stephens, columnist for the Financial Times — Writing a piece for the very pro-EU Financial Times (long considered one of the principal U,K. mouthpieces of the Bilderberg globalists), entitled "Can Brexit be stopped? Anything is possible," Stephens details a number of arguments that could be used to block a British exit from the EU. He concludes his article:

So pro-Europeans should give up? No. So long as a British government does not trigger Article 50, Britain remains an EU member. The political forces unleashed by this referendum are unprecedented and unpredictable. It is far from fanciful to imagine that the next two years or so will see the complete recasting of the nation's politics, quite possibly with the creation of a new, centrist, pro-European party. So those who want Britain to stay close to its own continent could think the unthinkable and work to make it thinkable.

New American

Written by William F. Jasper on June 29, 2016

Making the unthinkable thinkable (and doable) is the apparent purpose behind David Cameron's dilatory approach to triggering Article 50 of the Lisbon Treaty, which would start the exit ball rolling, and start the clock ticking on the two-year exit process. By delaying the process, he has added to the uncertainty and given the politicians, central bankers, commercial banking insiders, and pro-EU lobby the time and maneuvering room needed to stir up the Brexit anxiety and Brexit remorse to the levels needed to make formal proposals for a second referendum politically feasible.

However, working at cross purposes on this plan are the Eurocrats' own grandiose plans for an overreaching EU superstate, details of which have only begun leaking out in the past couple of days. As British voters become aware of this centralized power grab, it will be increasingly difficult for the EU schemers to overcome proper concerns about the Orwellian features of this Big Brother superstate.

Photo: AP Images

 Related articles:

 After Brexit, EU Bosses Unveil Plot for "Giant Superstate"

 Brexit Blamed for Market Upset, But Is It So?

 Global Merger Piece by Piece

 Brexit Leader Nigel Farage Blasts EU in European Parliament Speech

 Will Brexit Trigger a "Domino Effect" Among Other EU Member States?

 Brexit Fallout: Cameron to Resign as PM, Labour May Dump Jeremy Corbyn

 Independence Day! — Historic "Brexit" Victory, UK Votes to Leave EU

 Brexit Crunch Time: Cameron & Co. Ratchet Up "Project Fear" Before Vote

 Billionaires & Globalists Vs. the People — As Brexit D-Day Vote Looms

 Bilderberg Elites: Stop Trump, Boost Hillary; Stop Brexit, Boost Migration

Subscribe to the New American

Get exclusive digital access to the most informative, non-partisan truthful news source for patriotic Americans!

Discover a refreshing blend of time-honored values, principles and insightful perspectives within the pages of "The New American" magazine. Delve into a world where tradition is the foundation, and exploration knows no bounds.

From politics and finance to foreign affairs, environment, culture, and technology, we bring you an unparalleled array of topics that matter most.

Subscribe

What's Included?

24 Issues Per Year Optional Print Edition Digital Edition Access Exclusive Subscriber Content Audio provided for all articles Unlimited access to past issues Coming Soon! Ad FREE 60-Day money back guarantee! Cancel anytime.