

Written by Bob Adelman on February 9, 2017

Greece Needs Another Bailout; Disagreement Threatens EU Itself

The report on Greece's financial condition issued by the International Monetary Fund (IMF) on Monday was dismal, but, said the central bank, its future remains bright. First, the bad news: The EU member will fall far short of the budget-surplus targets put in place in order to get the last bailout. The Greek economy must grow at 3.1 percent but it expanded by only 0.4 percent last year.

However, the IMF said Greece's economy is expected to grow by 2.7 percent in 2017. An unnamed European Union official who spoke to Bloomberg on the condition of anonymity said that the IMF's projections aren't based on reality and don't take into account what really happening in Greece.

That's critical because Germany and the IMF would partner in any new loan granted to Greece (in addition to the $92 billion it's already receiving from other EU countries), and German Chancellor Angela Merkel is up for reelection in March. She is under pressure from citizens already unhappy about the $100 million in bad debt Germany has had to write off for Greece, and, worse, an increasing populist resentment that Germany is helping Greece out of its own self-inflicted financial difficulties.

The Greek drama is familiar: The IMF says its debt is too high, and it is. Eurozone creditors, already in hock to the member, won't lend more, leaving the country's financial salvation to the mercies of Germany and the IMF. In order to get more money (which will be used to make that July payment), Greece will likely have to suffer additional austerity measures. But the Greek economy has been steadily shrinking ever since its financial problems were first made public back in 2009. Its national debt is nearly twice the country's total economic output, and growing. Its interest payments are taking an increasing percentage of the government's shrinking revenues. Unemployment remains at 25 percent, and tax evasion continues apace.

Moody's said in December that if there is no agreement on another bailout by the IMF and Germany, it "increases the risks that repayments to bondholders due in July 2017 may be missed."

This comes at a critical moment in the history of the EU. Aside from the challenge Merkel is facing from disaffected citizens over continued bailouts of a country considered to be weak, corrupt, and politically unable to manage its affairs properly, the pall of Brexit hangs over the agglomeration. Add to that the fact that the United States is a major funder of the IMF (and has a say in the matter), and fears that President Donald Trump may pull the plug are increasing. In October 2012, Trump tweeted: "Greece should get out of the euro & go back to their own currency — they are just wasting time." Now that Trump is president, Greece and its bailors are wasting not only time but American taxpayer monies as well.

By July, if not earlier, Americans will know whether Greece gets another bailout, or defaults again. They will also have a much clearer picture of the future of the European Union itself. It's possible, and perhaps even likely, that the tiny country of Greece (population, 11 million) could be the final straw that breaks the back of the European Union (population 540 million), and accelerates its unwinding.

Written by Bob Adelman on February 9, 2017

An Ivy League graduate and former investment advisor, Bob is a regular contributor to The New American magazine and blogs frequently at LightFromTheRight.com, primarily on economics and politics. He can be reached at badelmann@thenewamerican.com.

Subscribe to the New American

Get exclusive digital access to the most informative, non-partisan truthful news source for patriotic Americans!

Discover a refreshing blend of time-honored values, principles and insightful perspectives within the pages of "The New American" magazine. Delve into a world where tradition is the foundation, and exploration knows no bounds.

From politics and finance to foreign affairs, environment, culture, and technology, we bring you an unparalleled array of topics that matter most.

Subscribe

What's Included?

- 24 Issues Per Year
- Optional Print Edition
- Digital Edition Access
- Exclusive Subscriber Content
- Audio provided for all articles
- Unlimited access to past issues
- Coming Soon! Ad FREE
- 60-Day money back guarantee!
- Cancel anytime.